The increasing number of women in the workforce has given them more financial independence, which has made it easier for them to leave unhappy marriages. The rising cost of living has also made it more difficult for couples to make ends meet, which has led to increased stress and conflict within marriages. And the changing attitudes towards marriage and divorce have made it more acceptable for people to end their marriages if they are not happy.

As a result of these factors, the divorce rate in Japan has been rising steadily in recent years. In 2018, the divorce rate was 1.87%, up from 1.65% in 2010. This trend is expected to continue in the coming years, as more and more couples decide to end their marriages.

The impact of divorce on Japanese society

The rising divorce rate in Japan is having a significant impact on Japanese society. One of the most noticeable changes is the increasing number of single-parent households. In 2018, there were over 1 million single-parent households in Japan, up from 750,000 in 2010. This trend is expected to continue in the coming years, as more and more couples divorce.

The increasing number of single-parent households is putting a strain on Japanese society. Single parents often face financial difficulties, and they may also struggle to find affordable housing. In addition, single parents may have difficulty finding childcare, which can make it difficult for them to work.

The rising divorce rate is also having an impact on the Japanese economy. Divorce can be expensive, and it can also lead to a loss of income for both spouses. In addition, divorce can lead to a decrease in productivity, as both spouses may be preoccupied with their personal problems.

The rising divorce rate is also having an impact on the Japanese family system. In the past, the Japanese family was very traditional, with the husband as the head of the household and the wife as the homemaker. However, the rising divorce rate is leading to a more egalitarian family structure, in which both spouses share the responsibilities of childcare and housework.
