

Rwanda's Rebirth and the Man Who Dreamed It

In 1994, Rwanda was torn apart by a genocide that killed over 800,000 people. The country was left in ruins, and its people were traumatized. But out of the ashes of genocide, a new Rwanda emerged, led by a man with a dream: Paul Kagame.

Kagame was a young military officer when the genocide began. He quickly rose through the ranks, and by 1994, he was the de facto leader of the Rwandan Patriotic Front (RPF), the rebel group that had been fighting to end the genocide.

After the genocide, Kagame became the President of Rwanda. He immediately set about rebuilding the country. He created a new constitution, established a new government, and launched a program of economic reforms.
