Themes of Unity and Healing

At the core of "The Hill We Climb" lies a profound message of unity. Gorman calls upon Americans to bridge their differences and come together as one people:

“ "We will not be turned against each other.
We will not be defined by our differences.
We will be defined by our shared dreams." ”

Her words echo Martin Luther King Jr.'s iconic "I Have a Dream" speech, invoking a vision of a society where all individuals are treated with dignity and respect, regardless of race, religion, gender, or sexual orientation.

Gorman also emphasizes the importance of healing the wounds inflicted by a divisive past. She acknowledges the pain and suffering that many have endured, but urges Americans to embrace the opportunity for reconciliation and forgiveness:

“ "We will not be perfect.
But we will strive for perfection.
We will not be silent.
We will be heard." ”

These powerful lines convey a sense of determination and hope, encouraging Americans to work together towards a brighter future.
